Question: 6

A major IT Services company currently has an Operations Center in London. The company operates globally, providing Managed Services to its customer base. The Business services require monitoring the Server and Network infrastructure. Each end customer has a data repository in the London Centre that they view events of their leased line. The Operations team in London currently uses various products such as IBM NetView and other legacy applications in the EMEA customer base. To achieve monitoring of the network, for the current goal of service availability and performance management, they will be replacing IBM NetView with the most recent version of IBM Tivoli Network Manager. They mention that future plans include upgrading the existing infrastructure by using Netcool OMNibus in the London site also at a later stage. But the aim is to expand into the US for its current Business Goals. To achieve this aim, the project plan has isolated specific weaknesses of relevant roles of the customers proposed service availability and performance management products, as well as a skills gap in some teams of the existing client based solutions. The stakeholder has requested how the skills gap will be met, the timeframe and cost of meeting their needs, for further review by management. They are keen to ensure that the right technical ability is used in the customers situation and that all relevant employees and operators need education but have a requirement to keep the expenditure minimal. What is the most relevant resource to help formulate the proposed education needs and plan?

- A. Only investigate IBM partners training for each role that has a skills gap.
- B. Only investigate IBM educational product specific training for each role that has a skills gap.
- C. Investigate the customer's human resource department for internal training, to check it fills the skills gap identified.
- D. Investigate IBM educational offerings including IBM partners educational offerings, for each role that has a skills gap.

Answer: D
